

Description of Database

We create a table named “Customer” within a database called “xbook”. There are five columns for this table, id, username, email, password and phone number to store customer information respectively. As a back-end storage, we can retrieve required data and manipulate updated data by using php code interactively.